Acknowledgements

I wish to thank all who have been of assistance to me in researching, writing and publishing this book. In particular, I wish to single out two artist friends Sharon and Liam Belton, RHA, who were most helpful and enthusiastic in encouraging me to undertake the task. Not only did they relate to me many interesting stories about the Brothers of the Brush, but Liam also lent me his precious archive of press cuttings about art and artists, which proved to be an invaluable source of information.

My best thanks are also due to the many artists and artist's estates who assisted with information, and who gave permission for images to be reproduced in the book. As soon as the COVID-19 restrictions were relaxed in 2021 I was able to visit most of the concerned artists still alive and working, including John Behan, Edward Mooney, Alice Hanratty, Carey Clarke and Anita Shelbourne, and interview them, as well as calling on Sinéad Breslin, the widow of the late John Kelly. She and her daughters could not have been more helpful in providing me with information and access to archival material. I was in communication also by telephone and letter with Joseph O'Connor, Brian Bourke, Michael Kane and his wife Shelley MacNamara, and they were all most helpful, for which I thank them sincerely.

John Behan alerted me to the American author Roy Lisker and his novel set in Dublin, titled Harvest of Chains: A Fable of Art and Artists in Dublin in the 70s, which was published online in a Kindle edition in 2014. It was a fascinating source of information and I thank the author for permission to quote from it.

A trawl through the literature revealed much information about the artists in this survey, and I am thankful to Brian Fallon, Aidan Dunne and the late Dorothy Walker who were important sources of information in
